

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

Several further frontal systems are expected to run quickly eastwards across the country later on Monday, on Tuesday and on Wednesday. These will contain very moist tropical air and are likely to lead to further bouts of persistent, and at times, heavy rain. Totals of 30 to 50 mm are possible, with a risk of in excess of 70 mm on exposed west-facing hills.

Uncertainties remain over the northern extent of the higher rainfall amounts, as well as the timings of the more intense spells of rain. The warning will therefore be kept under review but nevertheless some significant impacts are possible following the very wet weekend.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Alert of Rain

Valid from 15:00 on Mon, 16th Nov 2015 until 23:59 on Wed, 18th Nov 2015

Successive frontal systems moving quickly from west to east will each bring some persistent and locally heavy rainfall for a time, particularly across the hills of northwest England and northwest Wales.

Be aware that, given the already saturated conditions, flooding is possible either from standing water or from rivers which remain high after the large rainfall totals of recent days, particularly from the weekend.

This is an update to the warning issued on Friday, to include more of the Pennines. Northern Ireland and southwest Scotland have been removed from the warning area as further rainfall is not currently considered likely to bring further impacts.
